The 497th Tactical Fighter Squadron / the 8th Tactical Fighter Wing, the "Night Owls", were deployed to Ubon AB, Thailand in 1965, used laser-guided bombs during the Vietnam War, conducting precision attacks in the night against the Ho Chi Minh Trail (North Vietnam's major supply route). The "Night Owls" would dive down at night, so they were called "Black Doves". For this reason, the Luu (Lao) marking on the underside of the aircraft was almost covered by the paint. Furthermore, as the side of the intake, various types of "steak" were drawn in addition to the name of the aircraft. Many models of the D-700 AWR and the "COMAN-D" antenna, a navigation device to lead the position of the aircraft, equipped on their back, and could be used as probes during the night attacks.
